

Know your rights and responsibilities: sexual health

We all have rights and responsibilities and want safe, respectful, and healthy relationships. We all have the right to decide when, where, in what situation, and with whom we would like to be sexual. If you think you are ready to start having a sexual relationship with someone, it is important to look after your sexual health and be aware of the consent laws in Australia. It is important to remember any sexual activity without consent is against the law in Australia.

If you are sexually active, it's important you visit a doctor regularly to have sexual health checks and you can ask your doctor about your sexual and reproductive health and rights issues.

SUMMARY

- It is important to be well informed about your sexual health.
- Anyone who is sexually active should have regular sexual health check-ups.
- Practicing safe sex can minimise your risk of a sexually transmitted infection (STI) or unplanned pregnancy.

What is sexual health?

If you are sexually active, it is important to be well informed and ensure you and your partner are safe, healthy and respectful. Sexual health includes physical, emotional and mental wellbeing in relation to sexual matters.

Sexual health is defined by the World Health Organization as 'a state of physical, emotional, mental and social wellbeing in relation to sexuality; it is not merely the absence of disease, dysfunction, or infirmity. Sexual health requires a positive and respectful approach to sexuality and sexual relationships, as well as the possibility of having pleasurable and safe sexual experiences, free of coercion, discrimination, and violence.'

What is a sexual health check?

Getting a sexual health check is simple and is a normal part of a healthy sex life. If you are sexually active, it's important you visit a doctor regularly to have sexual health checks. During a sexual health check, your doctor will ask detailed questions about your sexual history to help determine the support you need. Although you may feel nervous or uncomfortable discussing these topics, doctors are trained to do this and it's important to answer any questions honestly as it could impact on the types of tests or advice you're given. Any discussion you have with your doctor in Australia is strictly confidential.

Sexual health checks might involve:

- discussions about your sexual history and your rights in sexual relationships

- conducting tests (urine, blood, swab tests or visual examinations)

- discussing contraceptive options to prevent sexually transmitted infections and pregnancy

- diagnosing reproductive issues or sexual dysfunction.

Safe sex - minimising risk of STIs and unplanned pregnancy

The best way to reduce your chance of getting an STI or having an unplanned pregnancy is to practice 'safe sex'. Safe sex means taking measures to reduce having contact with your partner's body fluids, and can include using contraception during sexual activity.

Contraception

Contraception works to prevent pregnancy, so people can have sex while preventing an unplanned pregnancy. It's important to discuss contraception with a new partner before you decide to have sex. Contraception affects both you and your partner, so you are both responsible for it. Both you and your partner should consent to any sexual activity. In Australia, if your partner refuses to use contraception, or displays behaviours such as pressure, manipulation or threats around the use of contraception, this is considered a form of sexual abuse.

There are many different forms of contraception. For example, women can consider using a contraceptive implant, emergency contraception pill or oral pill to further reduce the chance of pregnancy; however, they do not protect you from STIs. Some of these contraceptives need a prescription from a doctor or family planning clinic in Australia.

When used correctly, a condom is the only method of contraception that helps to protect against both STIs and pregnancy. They're easily accessible, small and easy to carry. You don't have to see a doctor to get them – you can buy them from the chemist or supermarket or receive them for free at family planning clinics.

It's a good idea to see your doctor or family planning clinic if you're considering your options for contraception. They can advise you on which options might be right for you depending on your health and lifestyle.

STIs

STIs can be passed from one person to another during sexual activities. Some STIs have no symptoms, so you may not know if you or a partner has an STI.

There are many different types of STIs and they can be caused by viruses (e.g., human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), herpes), bacteria (e.g., gonorrhoea, syphilis) or parasites (e.g., pubic lice). Common STI symptoms might include a skin irritation or rash, itching, pain in your lower abdomen or genitals, or a burning sensation going to the toilet.

If there is an infection, it is important that you get treatment and advice on how to stay healthy. While some infections appear to go away without treatment, they stay active in the body. This means infections can be passed on to your sexual partners and/or cause health problems later.

Where do I go for a sexual health check?

You can get checked at your local doctor, sexual health or family planning clinics. Remember, your doctor cannot share the results of your testing with anyone without your permission.

When do I need a sexual health check?

Anyone who is sexually active should have regular sexual health check-ups. If any of the following is relevant to you, a sexual health check is strongly recommended:

- if you think you might have an STI

- if you've had unsafe/unprotected sex

- if a condom broke or fell off during sex

- if you or your partner have more than one sexual partner

- if you're at the start of a new sexual relationship.

Where to get help or talk to someone
